Course Description

Professional development guidelines for mental health providers indicate that they work within their scope of competence, but several areas of practice and research have expanded at a rate far faster than the training structure has been able to accommodate. Despite this ever-pressing need, there continues to be a significant lack of available resources. This is particularly prominent in the context of psychological assessment. This CE course will focus on elucidating the ethical implications of three areas of consideration: models of teletherapy and teleneuropsychological practice; application of these services among diverse populations; and utilization of digital psychology and cyberpsychology in a variety of settings.

Goals & Objectives

1. Describe the different domains and models of telehealth assessment practice.
2. Assess the risks and benefits of using each model discussed.
3. Analyze potential sources of health disparities in the utilization of telehealth assessment health practice.
